“The Bellamore Boys”

What other country rugby club has Dad and his three sons all playing rugby on a Saturday.

Kurow Rugby club has just that. Imagine what it's like in the Nowell household on a Saturday morning getting Dad and three boys ready for rugby.

Ben and Emma Nowell farm sheep, beef and deer at “Bellamore” near Lake Waitaki and take the Saturday rugby ritual all in their stride.

Dad Ben, who has played rugby both in Canterbury and Japan, now plays for the Kurow Senior Team and is also co-coach of the team.

His three sons – Jack 8 years, Harry 6 years and Charlie 4 years all play J.A.B rugby for Kurow.

On Saturday morning the boys could be playing at different venues but Mum Emma copes well with help from Grandparents, Bruce and Christine and Barb and Mark to get them to their games on time.

Dad Ben helps out when he can being a referee and encouraging his boys to do their best on the day.

Ben, Jack, Harry and Charlie keep up the good work and your enthusiasm for the love of rugby.

Who knows Kurow could produce another All Black who could follow in the foot steps of a former Kurow Rugby Player who became an All Black- The late Phillip Gard.

Indi Gard

The Fishy Tale of Lake Falconer Ayson

In discussing fishing, American author - and frequent visitor to NZ - Zane Grey once wrote that "If I fished only to capture fish, my fishing trips would have ended long ago." I would hazard a guess that those words reflect the philosophy of most of those who own rods of one type or another. Whilst Grey's overall personal attitude left much to be desired during his many visits from the late 1920s, credit goes to Grey for placing New Zealand firmly on the international deep-sea fishing map. Grey never trout-fished the South Island but did so on the Tongariro River. So enamoured was he, that he tried to buy the entire river for his personal use. He almost succeeded.

Native to Europe, brown trout were first introduced to NZ in 1867 from England via Tasmania. Of the trout and salmon ova shipped to Tasmania in 1864, only the trout eggs survived the 3-month journey. It took three years for the Tasmanian breeding programme to be successful enough to enable exportation of trout eggs to NZ and South Africa. The first successful trout hatching was in Christchurch on October 10th 1867.

Descended mainly from Californian Steelheads, 1883 saw the introduction of rainbow trout to NZ; bred by the Auckland Acclimatisation Society, then initially released in Lakes Rotorua and Taupō. In their native environment, rainbow trout – like salmon – migrate to sea. We do not understand why NZ rainbow trout do not migrate.

Salmon's introduction was more fraught.

"On 20 January 1868 the Celestial Queen was loaded in London with 834 boxes containing 220,000 salmon ova and 14,500 trout ova. They were stored in a 16 ft by 12 ft ice house that was 11 ft high (4.9 m x 3.7 m x 3.4 m). Lined with sheet lead, it was insulated by 9 inches (225 mm) of charcoal and packed with blocks of ice from Wenham Lake, Massachusetts.

Live gudgeon, tench, carp and oysters, a dozen Dorking fowl eggs and a bundle of Scotch heather were also carried on board. On 2 May, after a voyage of 103 days, the Celestial Queen arrived in Port Chalmers. The ova were in 'excellent condition', but the fish had died. The tench had been accidentally thrown overboard while their water was being changed. The fate of the two oysters that were still alive is unknown.

*Neither the Atlantic salmon nor the brown trout survived in New Zealand waters. However, the brown trout taken to Hobart in 1864 had survived, and their progeny had been brought to New Zealand in 1867. The first quinnat or Californian salmon (Oncorhynchus tshawytscha) ova arrived in New Zealand on the steamship Vasco de Gama on 5 November 1875. Much augmented, these are the basis of today's salmon fishing." (Nigel Isaacs; NZ History)*

Salmon history now moves to the Hakataramea River. Credit is due to the largely forgotten man who persuaded the government of the day to invest in large-scale salmon hatcheries. Lake Falconer Ayson was born in NZ two years after his parents emigrated in 1853.

Amongst his many roles were farm labouring, fencing, ploughing, harvesting and shearing. Living in Duntroon, he became a rabbit inspector working throughout the Waitaki area. During these times he became an avid trout angler.

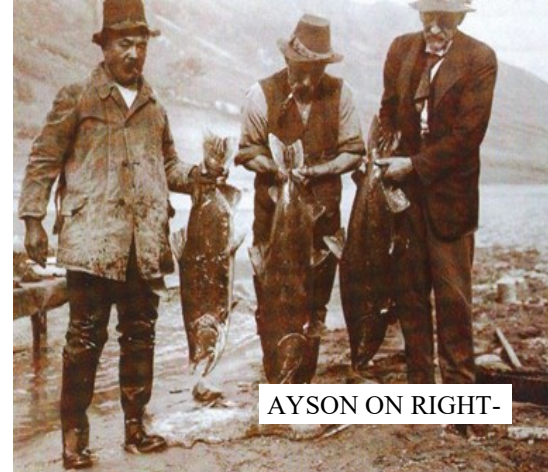

We do not know why Ayson made a sudden move to Masterton in 1886 to take up the role of curator of the Wellington Acclimatisation Society. It may have been his meeting with Francis Pillans, an Englishman who farmed in South Otago. Pillans had experience in fish culture, which may have piqued Ayson's interest. In 1898, the government put Ayson on a sailing ship and set him loose on the fishing world.

Prior to Ayson's voyages, large amounts of time and money was spent in attempting to introduce Atlantic salmon to NZ waterways. None were successful. Including the 1875 arrivals. Travelling to Europe, Britain and North America, Ayson's new knowledge would have a direct impact on the scientific management of marine fisheries.

Whilst in North America, authorities offered chinook and sock-eye salmon ova to him. Returning to NZ, Ayson pushed forward his belief that instead of attempting to introduce salmon to many waterways as had been done in the past, concentration should occur in one river only. That river would be the Hakataramea where the first salmon arrived in December 1900. Ayson was to return to North America several times in the early 1900s to escort new batches of chinook ova. Once incubated, they released huge quantities of salmon fingerlings into the Hakataramea and Upper Waitaki Rivers. Within two years, adult Chinook were returning to the Waitaki River mouth.

AYSON ON RIGHT-

Ayson's belief was that once salmon established themselves, their migratory patterns would take them up other rivers along NZ's east coast. This is indeed what happened. His attempts to introduce Atlantic salmon continued with the construction of a large hatchery on Southland's Waiau River. Success did not follow. In fact, no one world-wide has acclimatised Atlantic salmon in the wild.

Neither Ayson's or the salmon story ends here, but we should rightly remember Lake Falconer Ayson for his enthusiasm and determination to establish salmon populations in NZ waterways. Whether the right or wrong of his efforts should be debated in today's PC world is irrelevant when looking at the popularity of trout and salmon fishing in NZ. Any dedicated washer of flies and lures will understand that.

The final salmon thought I leave to the late great Joan Rivers; "A female salmon lays three thousand eggs a year - and has yet to receive a Mother's Day card from one of them." A thought to ponder!
